Splitting begins in the micronucleus and flagellum, then goes on in the macronucleus and finally in the protoplasm. These daughter organisms form large rosettes, in which the flagellar ends form the center, the bodies of the parasites lying at the periphery. The absence of an undulating membrane and the fact that the micronucleus shows no tendency to approach the macronucleus prove this parasite to be no trypanosome. The absence of any flagellated forms in the life history of the piroplasmata appear to disprove Laveran and Mesnil's theory. It is at present doubtful to which, if any, of the protozoal parasites the cause of kala-azar bears the greatest resemblance. The name Leishmania Donovanii, as originally suggested by Ross, therefore appears most appropriate. The most successful cultivation results were obtained in an acid medium and at 22...
