Excerpt: . alleged informality in their being entered, for which he himself was not obnoxious to blame, it was the general opinion that he would have borne off one of the first prizes. A medal, however, could not be denied him. We have thus far alluded only to Mr. Chickering s professional career. The collateral relations which he sustained were not less creditable and honorable. His musical knowledge, taste, and discrimination were acknowledged by that association which for a quarter of a century has confessedly stood at the head of all musical associations in the Western world. We mean the Handel and Haydn Society, over which he presided for some seven or eight years. While he was at their head the association enjoyed a degree of prosperity and exerted an influence unknown before, and the jarring elements which unfortunately will always mingle where harmony alone ought to prevail, were reconciled. So great a degree of confidence was felt under his directions, that the desired and appropriate harmony always did prevail. The financial concerns flourished, and the association received such an impetus that its future permanence and prosperity were secured. Under his administration, also, the best talents and the best services were secured, and the public ear was gratified by a variety in the public exhibitions as gratifying as it was new. It seemed as if new life and new energy had been infused into every part, and the prodigious influence which he wielded in the...
