In muscles where a tendinous attachment is wanting. Stoffel's operation on the peripheral nerves may be used. The latter method is especially useful in spasticity affecting the quadriceps extensor and adductors in the lower extremity and the pronators, biceps, coraco-brachialis, brachialis anticus, etc., in the upper extremity. In the long flexors of the fingers the Stoffel operation is to be recommended as simpler than the attack on the numerous tendons. The same holds true for the flexors of the toes. With the relief of the spasticity in the operated muscles voluntary movement returns in the antagonists. Unfortunately, by this method the source of the spasticity is not removed; the centripetal impulses continue so that in severe spastic conditions there is a return of the condition. For a...
